JOHN JAMES AUDUBON

Artist ☆ Naturalist

The birds that grace this dining car are faithful reproductions of original paintings by the great artist-naturalist, John James Audubon, who did a great deal of his work in Louisiana. Audubon Park in New Orleans is named after him.

Audubon dedicated his life to the painting of birds and in his lifetime painted 1065 birds in 435 separate paintings.

Such a task was not easy in Audubon's time. There were no photographs nor mounted specimens to guide him. He traversed the wilds from Labrador to Louisiana and the Florida keys, and from Pennsylvania to Texas, enduring the hardships of primitive travel to paint his birds in their natural habitat.

Audubon lived in a pioneer era when America's natural resources seemed as limitless as the horizons to the west. Yet Audubon cried out against the wanton destruction of birds and animals that he witnessed wherever he went, and warned, "The war of extermination cannot last many years more."

It is little wonder that, when in 1886 an organization was formed "for the protection of American birds not used for food," it should take the name Audubon Society. Today the National Audubon Society and its local chapters in New Orleans, Los Angeles, and other cities across the continent, constitute the largest conservation organization in the world.

Audubon's paintings remain as an enduring monument to his genius; but his name may outlive his works because it has become the symbol for love of nature, love of country.
